The Impact of Trauma on Children at Different Ages

What a Traumatic Situation is Like for a Young Child

- Important relationships are key to a young child’s feelings of safety. They are totally dependent on a protective shield provided by adults. They become really upset when they hear cries of distress from a parent.
- Under stress, fear, or pain they instinctively try to get close to a familiar person. Powerful emotions motivate this proximity seeking.
- In the absence of a familiar person they can feel unresolved distress.
- They can cry for help or desperately wish for someone to intervene.
- They are overwhelmed by their intense physical and emotional reactions.
- They can feel totally helpless and passive.
- The single most important issue for a young child’s FELT safety is their preferred person.

What a Traumatic Situation is Like for a School-Age Child

- They have more ability to judge the seriousness of a threat and think about protective actions.
- They usually do not see themselves as able to counter a serious danger directly, but may imagine actions they wish they could take (like comic strip heroes)
- When there is violence against family members they can feel like failures for not having done something helpful.
- They may feel ashamed or guilty.
- They get scared of the intensity or speeding up of their emotions and physical reactions (“My heart was beating so fast I thought it was going to break”).

What a Traumatic Situation is Like for an Adolescent

- They are more actively judging and addressing dangers on their own, but this is still a developing skill and lots of things can go wrong along the way.
- During traumatic situations they make decisions about how to intervene.
- They can feel guilty, sometimes thinking their actions made things worse.
- They are learning to handle intense physical and emotional reactions in order to take action in the face of danger.

Product of “Reducing the Trauma of Investigation, Removal and Initial Out-of-Home Placement Project” (2008-09) conducted by Portland State University, Center for Improvement of Child and Family Services, funded through the Children’s Justice Act Task Force at the Oregon Department of Human Services. For more information contact Angela Rodgers at rodgersa@pdx.edu, or 503-725-8022